When you are open, transparent and honest, you develop a reputation for credibility that people remember. The drug testing business is deeply connected to integrity.

When the hurricane hit New Orleans in 2005, it devastated a competitor's laboratory. We could have seized the opportunity to take their clients, hire their displaced employees and likely put them out of business. But we didn't. Instead we wanted to help, and we agreed to support them until they could get back on their feet.

That decision was the best thing we could do for our industry at the time and it was one that helped shape who we are today - a business centered around sound ethics, ongoing collaboration and a steadfast commitment to do what's right.
