In the hustle of the workday, we can sometimes forget we're all the same—human beings with complicated personal lives in challenging work environments. That's why I believe in the power of acknowledgment. I look at my neighbor, at the person lost in thought walking down a hallway, at a client who I'm speaking with for the first time, and I greet them. I aim to make a genuine connection because our team is the olive branch, always extended.

We take time to step back and inspect the bridges we've built, because if we build them and forget them they will eventually crumble. Simply put, teamwork goes beyond business—our bonds transcend titles and roles. Acknowledging small, day-to-day truths can humanize us and enable proactive brainstorming, detailed problem-solving, and aide in positive customer interactions. We can't be there for each other if we don't acknowledge each other.
